NATURE'S BARRIERS IN WORLD'S FILMS

Obstacles of Mountain and River Overcome with Uncanny Ease and Speed.

Mountains, no matter how high, or rivers, no matter how wide, do not stop the soldiers in the great battles of the war. In "Fighting in France," the official motion pictures of the French Government now on exhibition under the auspices of The World at the Fulton Theatre. Mountains, no matter how high, I World at the Fulton Theatre, one sees both being overcome, here with REAR ADMIRAL LUDLOW grim flerce fighting, there with a scientific skill equally amazing.

Take, for instance, the scene of the oxen drawing the great guns over the pontoon bridge hastliy con structed across a wide and rushing He First Saw Service in Civil War river. You can imagine the atout planks creaking under the weight as the sleek-horned beasts, drafted from the service of industry for war, plod blong, doctie in their vokes, dragging the great long bores to the front.

A bridge has been blown up by the rearguard of a retreating force, and immediately the engineers of the advancing army, with an ingenuity and speed known only in times of conflict, lash together their pontoons and open the closed way. In the picture one sees the emergency bridgeway riding on the boats and rising and falling with the movement of the water.

Over this temporary structure flows a stream of heavy cannon drawn by teams of six oxen yoked two abreast. It is a remarkable picture. Beneath oon bridge is seen undulating like monstrous snake. The oxen seem puzzled by the strange experience of feeling the roadway moving up and down and sideways beneath their feet. Rurried as they were, the soldier ngineers have done their work carefully and well. The bridge gives beneath its load, it creaks and the boats swish in the water; but though the spectator holds his breath with excitement, no accident happens; the bridge is safer than it looks.

Gun after gun passes and this is but one point in the fifteen-mile front along which they are afterward seen firing in the actual battle, belching forth tons of metal and explosives, battering the trenches of the foe into shapeless masses of earth and stones —and dead human beings.

PLEAD FOR UNSAFE SCHOOL Eight Hundred Pupils Storm City Hall to Save It.
